trust with God's blessing open to them, we feel regards exports from them. And the reason is to confident that many friends will be raised up to be found in the very qualities which mark the supply us with the necessary funds. I have difference between British and German as clerks. To do a large export trade from, say, India requires, first, considerable capital or credit with which to make purchases in the interior; next judgment in the giving of credits and generally considerable skill and powers of organization. These are conditions in which the Englishman generally surpasses the German, and here our real competitor is the Greek. To import piece goods into India, to sell goods to the natives requires infinite perseverance, industry, and willingness to take trouble about minutice, and here the German excels. Such goods are sold almost entirely by retail, I do not, of course, mean to deny that English houses make large shipments to India and even large sales there; but they are sales to smaller merchants, who retail them in yet smaller quantities till they find their final destination per piece. Now the general tendency is to push out the middlemen and the German is not above selling his bale, or even his piece, direct. At first, perhale. he buys from the wholesale merchant, but soon he takes to importing small quantities himself; he knows the buyers and their tastes for better than his more wealthy English competitor, and he gradually takes the trade from him. The Englishman may, perhaps, condescend to sell a bale or to work for 1 per cent, profit. The German is willing to sell a piece, and to make a 2 per cent. profit he is willing to waste hours. This difference between the English and the German merchant is so well recognized that I should hardly have thought it necessary to menthe other. Plenty of Englishmen go to our colonies quite willing to abjure luxuries, and yet over and over again I have watched my fellowcountrymen trying to do business as Germans do it, and then abandoning it. What is the reason? It is mainly social.

We have in England a very hard and fast social line drawn between the wholesale and retail trader, and in English communities abroad the line is very strictly observed. The Englishman who goes abroad is generally draws from the former class: he is willing to work hard, but the magistrate Lin had some time ago to try a wishes also to enjoy his life, and aspires to be ciety were unknown in the colonies. Men went abroad outersibly to make money, intending when they had made it to leave the country and to enjoy in England, where they were not known, such society as they could get. Distances were long in those days, and people rarely went home until they went for good. Until they did so they were perhaps not too scrupulous in the way they made their money, certainly they cared nothing as to whether they were termed wholesale merchants. or retail shopkespers. But now they go frequent
